Different Homes Around the World

People around the world live in many kinds of homes. Houses are important because they protect people from bad weather and give them a safe place to live. The type of house people build depends on the climate, traditions, and materials in the area.

In Japan, many traditional houses are made of wood and paper. These houses are light because earthquakes are common in the country. Japanese homes often have sliding doors and small gardens.

In Norway, houses are built with strong wood and thick windows because winters are very cold. Many homes have fireplaces to keep families warm during snowy days.

In Mexico, some houses have flat roofs and colourful walls. The weather is usually warm, so people like open spaces and fresh air inside their homes.

In India, there are both modern apartments and traditional village houses. In villages, some homes are made of mud or clay because these materials keep the house cool in hot weather.

In conclusion, homes around the world are different, but all houses help people live safely and comfortably.

Country	Type of House	Feature
Japan		Light and safer during earthquakes
Norway	Wooden houses with thick windows

Endangered Animals

Many animals around the world are losing their natural habitats. People pollute rivers, cut down forests, and hunt animals illegally. As a result, some animals are becoming endangered.

Pandas live in bamboo forests in China. They eat bamboo every day, but many forests are disappearing because people build new roads and cities.

Dolphins live in seas and oceans. Water pollution and fishing nets are dangerous for them. Some dolphins cannot escape from the nets and get hurt.

Koalas live in forests in Australia. They sleep in trees and eat eucalyptus leaves. Forest fires destroy many trees, so koalas lose their homes.

People can protect animals by planting trees, reducing pollution, and protecting forests and oceans. Every person can help nature in small ways.
